

Case Scenario

Project Team Community Agreements

Meet the Project Team

A project team of four convenes, provides capacity building opportunities for, and shares information with a network of statewide food and health stakeholders who work individually and collectively to make progress on local food systems issues. The project team works at an outreach center within an academic institution, which created the network nearly 10 years ago. In the last five years that the full project team has been established, exponential progress has been made toward articulating and implementing a vision centering equity practice. The project team holds weekly meetings to share updates on progress across multiple projects, assign tasks, address requests from their network partners, and troubleshoot challenges. These challenges include network, project-related, and interpersonal challenges.

Adrian is a creative white, queer, trans non-binary organizer / facilitator / coach who believes feedback is a gift. They are interested in making the implicit explicit. As an abolitionist dedicated to collective liberation, they have an appreciation for group culture. They are also disabled and polyamorous. Adrian was the newest addition to the team.

Corinne is a multiracial female facilitator / strategist / team coordinator. She processes and translates information quickly and navigates issues politically. She is not conflict averse, taking on a “say what you mean” approach with close relationships, both personal and professional. With a deep commitment to racial and health equity influenced by her own lived experience, she is a fierce advocate and practices compassionate accountability. She and Belinda worked together for a few years before Adrian and Deidre joined the team.

Belinda is a white female who thrives in project management and administrative roles. Being relationship-oriented, she looks for connection and areas of agreement to move things forward. She is an external processor and prefers time to digest before providing input. Although she isn’t comfortable in conflict, she tries not to avoid it. She also co-founded the network and has had a long tenure with the organization.

Deidre is a Black, African-American female who is joyful and exudes positive energy. She is a trusted family- and community-oriented leader committed to designing just, sovereign systems focused on community health and economic development. As a holistic thinking, design strategist and researcher, she focuses on practical solutions and tools that challenge the status quo (including - and especially - Western thought). Deidre was a network member before joining the team.

Scenario #1: On a monthly basis, the project team meets with Evie, another colleague who has adjacent projects, for strategic coordination. Adrian works directly with Evie on her project. During these monthly meetings, a lot of ideas that the team must translate into strategic action often emerge. Having worked together on other creative projects, Corinne and Evie usually build on these emerging ideas in real time and very quickly, leaving everyone else playing catch up.

See the conversation unfolding →

Belinda expresses again that she doesn't want to interrupt, and Corinne tells her that it's fine to interrupt any time. Belinda explains that she is uncomfortable with interrupting. Corinne responds that she's happy to slow things down to check in with the group, but also that she can't make Belinda feel comfortable with doing something that she has given Belinda permission to do to meet her needs.

Belinda

Yeah, I'm having some trouble keeping up too. I don't want to interrupt the flow of ideas, though!

Corinne

Oh, let me explain... I try to follow Evie's line of thought until it's complete so I can come back and translate the whole idea.

Adrian

I'm sorry... I know Evie and I work really closely, but I'm having trouble keeping up with where this conversation is going.

I'm just flowing with things. If I don't understand something, I'll follow up.

Deidre

Possible Solution: Adrian has suggested that the project team create Community Agreements to mitigate this issue. The project team doesn't seem directly opposed to the idea, but they have a very heavy workload and this is another to-do. Adrian offers to pull together some draft language and the other project team members agree to review, comment, and give input.

But this surfaces a new issue...

Scenario #2: Deidre notices an agreement about addressing one another with the proper pronouns and is confused. This issue has never been brought up among the project team before. She wonders if this is directed toward her because she has unintentionally used the wrong pronouns with Adrian before, and she brings this up in a project team meeting.

Adrian

I didn't mean to do that. But also, it doesn't feel good when I'm misgendered. It's my identity.

What is this about in the community agreements? Are you talking about me? Couldn't you just talk to me about it directly? This feels like policing.

I don't do that on purpose, but you could've just spoken directly to me about it.

I agree. It does feel like policing. In my opinion, formal community agreements are for large groups that might not know one another well. We're a close team - we should be able to talk to one another directly.

(Mostly listening) I see both sides...

Belinda

Deidre

Corinne

Discussion Questions

1. What is happening in these scenarios? How would you diagnose the issue(s)?
2. What interpretations can you offer of this team's communication processes?
3. What do you interpret to be the conflict goals in these scenarios? Are they topical, relational, identity-based, and/or process related? How so?
4. How is identity showing up in these conversations? Who do you most identify with in these conversations?
5. As this team moves forward, what challenges might come their way? What's possible here and who cares?